Evan Weinberg, Senior Property Manager, Cadillac Fairview

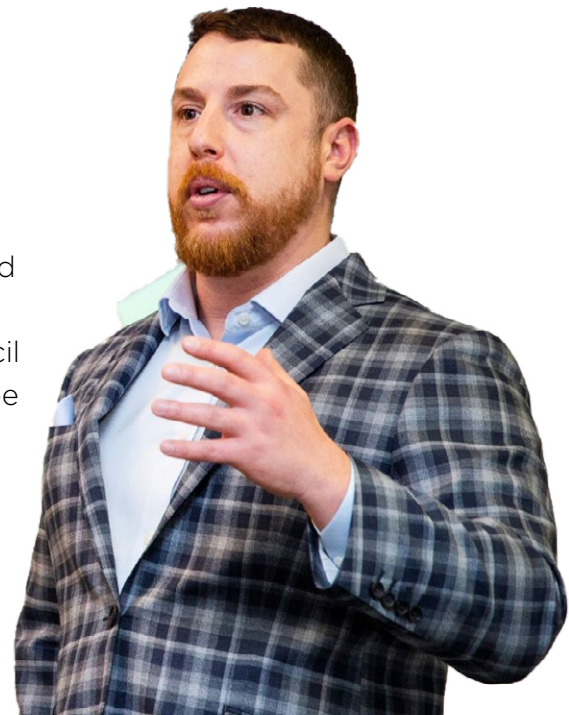

Evan has always had a passion for cities, business and people, and commercial real estate is an amazing way to bring all of these interests together.

It all started in university with a summer job in a firm that supported commercial office and retail properties in downtown Toronto. Evan began in a customer service role, but stayed on full time throughout graduate school, working in operations then planning and development.

On Evan's first day of graduate school (master's in urban development), a professor told his class to think outside of the box when looking for career opportunities as most people would be competing for the same limited jobs. This advice guided his career, which has not always been linear but has always been in commercial real estate.

Currently, Evan is a Senior Property Manager with Cadillac Fairview. His primary focus is the Toronto-Dominion Centre, but over the past few years it has expanded to include the East Harbour Lands.

Evan learned about BOMA early in his career, and BOMA has been instrumental in helping him stay connected with the industry and develop his skill sets. He currently serves on the BOMA Toronto Board of Directors as the Ex-Officio Young Professional. He also serves on both the Diversity, Inclusion and Anti-Racism (DIAR) Advisory Council and the Young Professional Committee. Evan feels it's important to be engaged in committees that help to advance and shape the industry. He also believes it's imperative to continually grow, and expand one's professional development. Since getting his masters, Evan has completed formal training in accounting and earned other real estate certificates.

Advice Evan would offer for young real estate professionals?

“Don’t be afraid to say ‘yes’ to opportunities – you never know where they may lead you. Your skill sets and experiences can help you find successes in areas you never imagined.”
